BTC ATMs

The first way to go around this problem is to search for BTC ATMs in your destination. At the moment, BTC ATMs are not widespread worldwide, but you can't fail to find one in your destination.

BTC ATMs are automated kiosks that allow you to buy Bitcoin using fiat money or a debit card. Some of them have bi-directional functionality allowing both the purchase of crypto and the sale of crypto for fiat. BTC ATMs save a lot of time and extra effort, not to mention that BTC itself is a way more anonymous payment method than cash or credit card.

A BTC ATM doesn't require much technical knowledge from your side - you only need to find a BTC ATM in your area and use it either to buy BTC in advance or exchange BTC to cash. BTC ATM charges are around 5% for BTC-purchasing and 3% for BTC-exchanging, as well as small service fees (usually it's 1%).

Gift Cards

The second solution is looking for gift cards that you can purchase with Bitcoins or any other digital currency. A gift card is also referred to as a voucher or gift certificate. Basically, it is a prepaid card with a store-of-value issued and managed by a business brand.

A gift card is generally an alternative to fiat money for buying goods or paying for services from a given store. For instance, if you have a $2000 Amazon gift card, you can purchase up to $2000 worth of goods from Amazon by redeeming it instead of paying with your credit card. Bitcoin travelers can use Bitcoin to buy gift cards for services or goods they plan to purchase. Numerous online stores, like Japan Gift Card, Coinsbee, Giftcards by Bidali, CGift, and Bitcoin Gift Cards, allow crypto users to acquire their gift cards with cryptocurrency. Bitcoin gift cards are a great way of spending crypto since they enable travelers to spend their digital assets on goods and services from businesses that do not accept Bitcoin payments directly.
